Mission Statement

In a world that is changing rapidly, not all species and habitats can evolve quickly enough to survive. PDX Wildlife concentrates on using scientific research and advances to improve the conservation of species. We accomplish this through innovative and creative research in captive breeding, habitat restoration, and community education.

Letter from Meghan Martin, Director of PDX Wildlife

2013 was our third year in operation. With half of our team in Asia and the other half remaining at home, we were able to complete several studies. Nate Wintle and myself traveled to Ya'an, China to finish the data collection for the panda project. Julia Ruppell finished her studies and received her PhD. Isaac Sleadd also completed his Antarctica studies and received his PhD. Lastly, Diana Dishman began working on a seafood initiative called PDXseafood.

Once again PDX Wildlife produced a talented group of scientists working on endangered species projects in China and Laos. With all of these projects beginning to wrap up, we look forward to new studies in China for 2014 and beyond. We had our third annual meeting, which took place on the second week in April to brainstorm the future studies of PDX Wildlife and to reconnect with each other.

A special thank you is needed to give recognition to the organizations and donors who made our research possible.

- The China Conservation and Research Center for the Giant Panda (CCRCGP)

Thank you for your continued support.

Sincerely,
Meghan Martin
